Young Buck, TI, The Game, & Ludacris – Stomp:

Our Understanding After Years Of Research & Due Diligence...

This song is a gangsta ballad about community life explained from the 'hood and the classic struggle from poverty to prestige through good planning and strong community. The artists sing about gangsta life and how they derive strength from the gang/community they belong to. They profess that "when you got love for the streets, you get love back". They claim that every gangster needs to represent his 'hood and not forget where he comes from, this applies to all communities, of course each has its own set of values. In this viewpoint, they also identify everyone with the gang/community they belong to. This gangsta life, as in other songs, goes hand in hand with violence, in which the artists threaten violence on anyone who challenges their gang/community power. The video reinforces this message with violent, militant imagery showing the artists and other gangstas marching in pseudo-military formation in an imposing display of power and force. It may surprise you to learn, that as long as it is defensive violence only, this song is correct to law, in that you have the right to defend yourself from any organization or community which threatens your way of life. Do not cause pro active harm, and only use equal force defensively, and you are lawful. The corporations posing as governments demonize and teach institutional hatred for any and all natural communities, yet they are the real criminals by definition.

As in the other cases of gangsta rap songs which extol the gang/community lifestyle, this song sings the supposed virtues of a social institution that ultimately holds no promise for young men or woman in the inner city. Gangsters often sing about how strong, powerful and rich they can become through their gangs or leading their community, but they do so often at the expense of themselves to protect others when others outside their community are in violation of the fundamental rights for them to live life and without fear as they and their community can protect themselves. You should all strive for this although peacefully of course within lawful means and rights always. This message resonates with the downtrodden and opportunity-starved youth that feel stuck in the world without real solutions, until now. Peace Maker Society offers a different approach to empowering the younger and older members of our most vulnerable communities. Instead of resorting to organized violence, youth and all community members worldwide can come into a more empowered state of being through understanding the rights that they have as sovereign individuals and learning how to exercise them in a way that respects the rights of others. Being peaceful means you have to be 10 times as tough, so predators will still leave you alone. Strong communities, with good defensive violence for self-protection only, is your unregistered, unincorporated right.
